PROGRAM DESCRIPTION

This program will discuss tissue injury from the perspectives of preventing and treating hard-to-heal wounds. It is important clinicians recognize threats to tissue health for the population served in long-term care nursing facilities. When tissue health prevention fails, the result is often hard-to-heal wounds such as pressure ulcer/injuries or other wound etiologies. Attend this program to discuss prevention of tissue injury, current wound closure interventions, tissue/wound closure augmentation using supportive modalities such as negative pressure, and preventing recurrence of wounds you've managed to close. Content is based on current evidence-based practices and CMS regulatory guidelines (F686, F684) for prevention and treatment and reporting (MDS, Section M) of hard-to-heal wounds. This is a basic to intermediate program appropriate for treatment nurses, clinical team leadership such as DONs/ADONs, and other interdisciplinary members such as therapy and providers who would benefit from a program providing up-to-date concepts in wound prevention and management.

- Identify threats to tissue health.
- Describe the most common wound etiologies with corresponding impairments leading to tissue injury.
- Develop a tissue injury prevention strategy that meets best clinical practices and regulatory mandates.
- Identify components of the wound assessment.
- Describe current treatment (basic and augmentative) interventions that meet best practice guidelines.
- Discuss threats to closure and preventing recurrence of full-thickness wounds.
